China In Africa: The Benefits For The Sub-Saharan Region Are Big, But The Potential Risks Are Rising May 15

Description:

Abstract

China's growth has been one of the most notable global economic developments of recent decades. It is now the world's second-largest economy in U.S. dollar terms and the largest in purchasing-power-parity terms. The pace of its export-led growth has seen it amass about US$4 trillion in foreign exchange reserves and become the U.S.'s largest creditor. As its size and wealth have increased, it has embraced new markets and investment opportunities, among them Africa. From a relatively modest base 15 years ago, China has become the largest trade partner and emerging market investor for much of the continent. The benefits have been mutual: Africa has helped feed China's high demand for commodities, a cornerstone of China's growth model, while in turn...
