Medical Holography Market - Forecasts from 2016 to 2021

Description:

Holography is a method of creating a 3D image of an object by recording a split beam of light from a laser which is reflected from the object. It is then combined with the film with light from a reference beam which enables the viewer to see a 3D image. An aging population and growing instances of chronic diseases have augmented the demand for holography technology in diagnostic imaging. Furthermore, rising adoption of holography products in medical education, biomedical research, and other clinical applications for gaining deep insights to the disease is also bolstering the global medical holography market growth.

Geographically, North America held the largest share of global medical holography market in 2015 owing to high funding for R&D activities and early adoption of holography technology and products by healthcare sector. Asia Pacific is also poised to grow at a considerable growth rate due to factors such as rising healthcare spending, improving healthcare infrastructure in developing economies such as China, India, and South Korea, and growing awareness regarding the usage of holography products in medical applications. However, the requirement of high capital investment and cost of the technology will hinder the growth of this market during the forecast period.
